if you are a typical parent, you may be blaming yourself for the way your child feels about himself. (I am using the words he and him rather than s/he and him/her to simplify the text.) Please know it is not your fault.

Yes, you are the one who raised him, and he looks to you for much of what he believes about himself.

Know two things: first, your child came into this world with a predilection for behaving and interpreting life through a set of filters that colors everything a certain way (which may or may not be the same as yours); and second, you did and do the best you can.

You can only do what you know. I have yet to see a child born with a “How-To” manual. In this world of nuclear families, there is seldom a mom, an aunt or another relative around to offer advice and input into daily life with a baby.

This book is not a how-to manual. There is no index to look up special problems and find pat solutions.

Living life is something we each do every day on a continuing basis. How we live our lives depends on how we think about our lives, the world, and ourselves. Breaking it down into the simplest of terms, how and what we think is all that matters.

The lifestyle we live is a result of how and what we think. how we interpret events and circumstances. More importantly, this book shows parents how to teach awareness and conscious living to their teen so they can discover who they are and how they tick. THEN they become free to make desired changes in how they live each moment.
