Three students, a Hungarian woman (Magda), a Hungarian man (Janos) and an English man (Gerald), arrive at Magda's parents' home. They have a lively discussion about the political situation, during which she flirts outrageously with both men, exasperating Janos because she cannot be serious. Gerald, secretly in love with her, tries to persuade her to leave the country when he returns home, but she refuses. The following year, while Janos is visiting Magda's mother to find out if she has reappeared after going missing, she suddenly arrives home, broken in spirit and reveals that she has been in prison. Janos suddenly asks her to marry him when she wants to know if she is serious enough for him now. Twenty-five years later, by which time they have a son and two daughters, Gerald returns for a visit. Magda asks for help in smuggling their son out of the country, and he agrees. The boy is impatient and decides to go immediately, before Gerald can get plans in place, but is killed at the border. Magda accuses Janos (still a party member) of betraying his own son, but the arrival of the secret police soon shows her that he has secretly converted to Christianity and has been helping to arrange escapes. The betrayal was carried out by their youngest daughter, who begins to feel remorse as her parents are led away to prison.
