Chronic struggles, heartache, confusion, crisis, even despair - these are constant burdens for many parents as they relate to their teenage and adult children. Some recognize they made serious parenting mistakes; other carefully followed principles of Christian parenting and have no idea what went wrong; and many are haunted daily with the parental self-doubt that they ultimately bear the blame for their children's problems. The authors explore what is the actual parental responsibility for actions of older offspring---and when to "let go" and allow consequences to take their normal course.
